Introduction. When one carries out so called "actuarial analysis" (more simply referred to as "reliability analysis") to draw these curves, it is, indeed, to discover the true failure behavior of an item or failure mode [], regardless of the maintenance plan currently in force. How is this possible?

[3] Often, the two terms "conditional probability of failure" and "hazard rate" are used interchangeably in many RCM and practical maintenance references. In those references the definition for both terms is: the conditional probability that an item will fail during an age interval given that the item enters (or survives) to that age interval.
