October 1997. The hazards posed to engineering structures by salt weathering are increasing because of such diverse factors as the spread of irrigation and high levels of atmospheric pollution. Salt weathering is also a potent cause of rock decay and geomorphological change in polar, coastal and desert environments.

The Salt Weathering Hazard in Deserts. Abstract The presence of salts in the environment, besides being a potent geomorphological process in coastal, urban and dry environments, is also a cause of severe deterioration in engineering structures. On the one hand, the fabric of some of the great new cities of the Middle East is being attacked,...

Salt weathering is a form of mechanical or physical weathering of rock. No chemical alteration of rock constituents is involved in salt weathering. The salt derives from an external source (capillary rising ground water, eolian origin, sea water along rocky coasts, atmospheric pollution). Salt weathering is favoured by dry conditions,...

Weathering. These mechanical processes include fracturing and disintegration by freezing and thawing, transport by glaciers, or even rolling along a shoreline by waves. Chemical weathering, on the other hand, refers to the chemical breakdown of minerals in rocks and the production of new minerals from the dissolved ions.

Physical breakup • pressure release • water: freeze - thaw cycles • crystallization of salt in cracks • thermal expansion and contraction All this increases the total surface area exposed to weathering processes.

Salt weathering, which has been demonstrated to be a major decay mechanism in a wide range of rock types and in many environments (Wellman and Wilson, 1965; Goudie and Viles, 1997), occurs primarily by salt crystallization (or hydration) pressure generation within the pores of a rock (Evans, 1970).
